ignored warnings by the government to "respond" to numerous complaints regarding their practices. Ultimately, they were nearly destroyed by the FTC, who sought to demolish their company at the behest of their competitors in the industry. The FIRST EVER case brought by the FTC against an ISO (independent sales organization) in the electronic transaction processing industry!

THE AV REVIEW:

"Chasing the Green" is one of those films that I've been following for awhile. "Girl with Gun" director Russ Emanuel is back with a compelling look at the true story of the first FTC case against an ISO. Jeremy London and Ryan Hurst do an admirable job of making us believe in the two brothers that took on the government and lost. What can I really say about the film that bigger venues haven't covered? William Devane and Robert Picardo brought the goods as veteran actors lending credence to strong supporting roles. Then, there's Heather McComb.

Heather McComb has come a long way from playing Jubilee in that FOX "Generation X" tv-movie. McComb works well opposite Jeremy London. She is the audience's gateway to this complicated story that could've turned rather ham-fisted in the hands of someone other than Emanuel. It's an amazing work that plays with detail and quiet serenity to make us care about the little guy. We don't have enough films about the little guy in American cinema.

I don't want to see Frank Capra melodramatic tales. I want to see true stories about Americans fighting against impossible odds and trying to better society for all that partake. That's what "Chasing the Green" does and it's why I hope you see it. It should be making the festival rounds or hitting DVD by the time this article goes up. Hopefully, you'll be able to check it out.
